Archibald argues that one of the problems with the current model - in which universities are responsible for the majority of grants, while the federal government provides student loans - is that a student cannot know the final price of attending a given institution until after he or she has applied, been accepted, and received a financial aid offer. As a result, students remain largely uninformed about the cost of their college educations until very late in the decision-making process, and thus have difficulty making a timely choice. In addition, financial aid information is kept private, creating confusion over the price of a college education and the role of financial aid.

The effects of gender issues are also examined for specific aid programs: Guaranteed Student Loans, Work Study Programs, National Direct Student Loans, Pell Grants, Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants; state scholarship and grant programs, athletic scholarships, military scholarships and veterans' benefits, and job training financial aid programs. Different schools have different policies regarding how they offer financial aids to students. A student seeking financial aid from any particular institution will, therefore, do well to stay abreast of information about that particular institution and its regulations regarding financial aid. Each of these schools has different aims regarding how much of student financial needs they are willing to meet. While some schools, like Columbia University, intend to meet 100% of the students' needs financially, some other schools go less. Grants are given to students without repayment. The amount of grant varies based on the level of education and also the complexity of the study work or project. In the case of New York University, for example, grants provided only meet 68% of the student's needs; this means the student may experience budget gap. This same school gives most of its aids to its students in the form of loans, which the student is expected to pay back after graduation.
